Great Camps and Remote Lodges Across the U.S.

Be it a lodge in the Adirondacks or a hot springs resort in an old mining town, these luxury refuges will make any long, cold winter more palatable.

Stone fireplaces and Pendleton blankets. Hot drinks and hotter springs. Solitude and starry nights. These are a few of our favorite things, conjured in the dead of winter when everyone seems to have a cough and a little hygge feels necessary. With that in mind, we rounded up a few of the Great Camps and remote luxury lodges across the United States to inspire your winter escapes. Some are historic; some only a few years old. One is on a glacier. All will leave you wanting more.

For a true Adirondack experience, spend the weekend at a historic “Adirondack Great Camp.” During the early 20th century, industrial behemoths of the Gilded Age vacationed in the Adirondack Mountains, where they built mansion-like log cabins decorated with granite fireplaces and furniture crafted from branches. Today, you can stay in a number of these lodges, including the Point, a Great Camp built by William Avery Rockefeller on 75 acres of Saranac Lake shorefront nearly a century ago. Now a Relais & Châteaux property with just 11 rooms, each with a lake view and a fireplace, it’s a surprisingly intimate haven with a staff ready to attend to your every whim. —AFAR Contributors in Best Weekend Getaways From NYC
